Michael "Mickey" L.Jeffrey Ryan "Whitey" Weitzel

Jeffrey Ryan "Whitey" Weitzel, 18, passed away on Saturday, April 12, 2008, at his home in Lampeter, following a courageous battle with cancer. He was surrounded by his loving family and friends. Born in Lancaster, he was the son of Jeffrey K. and Penny L. Shumake Weitzel.

Whitey was a senior at Lampeter-Strasburg High School. He had played for the L-S football team, and he had a passion for lacrosse, having played with the L-S boys lacrosse team since the club first began. Even though he was unable to continue playing, Whitey coached the junior varsity lacrosse team when he was able to attend their games.

He worked as a vendor for Jet Services, Inc. at Lancaster Barnstormers games and for Baltimore Ravens games in M&T Bank Stadium. Whitey enjoyed music, driving, going out to eat and being with his friends. He was very fond of the girls who would take him out for ice cream. Golf was another one of his loves, with his father teaching how to play the game.

When asked about Whitey, Lampeter-Strasburg High School Principal, Carroll J. Staub, said, "The impact that Ryan 'Whitey' Weitzel has had on the L-S community has been nothing short of amazing. He has inspired the entire school with his courage, determination, and attitude about life. Whitey has brought the L-S High School together like nothing else has for several years. While he is physically gone, his

Physicist John Wheeler, 96, worked on atom bomb, helped give 'black holes' their name

HIGHTSTOWN, N.J. (AP) — Physicist John A. Wheeler, who had a key role in the development of the atom bomb and later gave the space phenomenon black holes their name, has died at 96.

Wheeler, for many years a professor at Princeton University, died of pneumonia Sunday at his home in Hightstown, his daughter, Alison Wheeler Lahnston, said.

Wheeler rubbed elbows with colossal figures in science such as Albert Einstein and Danish scientist Niels Bohr, with whom Wheeler worked in the 1930s and '40s.

"For me, he was the last Titan, the only physics superhero still standing," Massachusetts Institute of Technology scientist Max Tegmark told The New York Times.

President Bush and first lady Laura Bush released a statement mourning "one of America's greatest physicists," particularly noting Wheeler's role as an educator.

"As a professor at Princeton University and the University of Texas-Austin, Dr. Wheeler inspired generations of students ... to transform their curiosity into scientific discoveries," they said.

Born in 1911, Wheeler was 21 when he earned his doctorate in physics from Johns Hopkins University. In the mid-1930s, he traveled to Denmark to study for a year with Bohr, who won a Nobel Prize for his work describing the nature of the atom.

In early 1939, with war looming in Europe, Bohr arrived in the United States with the news that German scientists had split uranium atoms. Working at Princeton, Bohr and Wheeler sketched out a theory of how nuclear fission worked.

During World War II, Wheeler was part of the Manhattan Project, the scientists charged with using nuclear fission to create an atomic bomb for the United States.

Unlike some colleagues who regretted their roles after bombs were dropped on Japan, Wheeler regretted that the bomb had not been made ready in time to hasten the end of the war in Europe. His brother, Joe, had been killed in combat in Italy in 1944.

Wheeler later helped Edward Teller develop the even more powerful hydrogen bomb.

The name "black hole" — for a collapsed star so dense that even light could not escape — came out of a conference in 1967. Wheeler made the name stick after someone else had suggested it as a replacement for the cumbersome "gravitationally completely collapsed star," he recalled.

"After you get around to saying that about 10 times, you look desperately for something better," he told the Times.

While he spent most of his academic career at Princeton, Wheeler moved to the University of Texas in 1976 because Princeton's retirement age was looming.

His wife of more than 70 years, Janette, died in October. He is survived by three children and several grandchildren and great-grandchildren.
